

ELLE DECOR

the new exotic trend

Hip & Classic

Color's Back!
Sensual Baths

AUGUST/SEPTEMBER
1999 $3.95

Siren All-American

After two decades as a globe-trotting model, Cheryl Tiegs settles into the serene life

Cheryl Tiegs in the garden of her Bel Air home.

The great room's 36-foot-high steel columns are clad in stained teak; the ceiling is covered in J. Robert Scott's Madagascar straw. See Resources.

text by WENDY GOODMAN

photography by FERNANDO BENGOCHEA

produced by MIGUEL FLORES-VIANNA

“We literally shopped the world”

E ven in our celebrity-soaked era, when sneezing in the right company seems to merit front-page news, Cheryl Tiegs's modeling career is hard to fathom. Tiegs, who worked from the late '60s to the mid-'80s, was a groundbreaking cover model for Glamour, Harper's Bazaar, Seventeen, and Sports Illustrated and was also the first American model to grace the cover of French ELLE, all of which landed her contracts with Cover Girl, Clairol, and Sears. Tiegs appeared on the cover of Time three times; the March 6, 1978, issue gushed that she was “the nation's muse, our new moon,” while photographer Francesco Scavullo raved, “She has fire and excitement in her eyes. Her body looks healthy, and strong enough so you could wrestle and roll with her.” Almost overnight, Tiegs became the golden girl who didn't tarnish.

Maury Hopson, the hairdresser who did Tiegs's tresses for her Glamour and French ELLE covers, remembers being in Paris with her in 1968 and practically starting a riot when they went to La Coupole one night. "I don't think they had ever seen a beauty so tall," Hopson says of six-footer Tiegs, who was oblivious to the commotion. "Cheryl never, ever runs," he adds. "In the midst of the most frenetic set, she would just move at her own speed, and all she would have to do was smile that smile, and she'd make us all look good. She is a pro."

This page: An 18th-century Japanese gold-leaf screen depicting Mt. Fuji lines a wall of the sitting room, which also includes an antique English chinoiserie table and a 19th-century Chinese bamboo prayer mat. Facing page: In the dining room, a 19th-century teak table from the Javanese governor's mansion and an 1820s Persian carpet.

Above: A stone window frame from the Bank of New York serves as a mantelpiece in the master bedroom. Left: A half-tester bed by Waldo's Designs is draped in silk voile from the Silk Trading Co. Facing page: In son Zack's room, a red cashmere blanket by Ralph Lauren covers a reproduction Colonial four-poster from Martynus. See Resources.

"I was lucky to be working when the whole thing was changing, and they began using my name," Tiegs says. "I was very fortunate. I always loved modeling. I don't understand these girls who complain about it now. It's a great career." Today Tiegs works with children and on environmental issues, sitting on the boards of Coach for Kids, which provides medical treatment for homeless children, and the Washington, D.C.-based Earth Conservation Corps. She still has her hand in the marketplace, with her own line of sportswear for QVC, as well as eyeglasses, hosiery, watches, and wigs.

The daughter of an undertaker, Tiegs, 51, grew up in Alhambra, California. As a 16-year-old pom-pom girl, she was spotted by a talent scout, which led to covers for Teen. In 1970 she married Stan Dragoti, an art director 15 years her senior. They lived in a Spanish-style mansion in Bel Air where Tiegs flirted with the idea of being a Hollywood housewife. After they divorced, she moved to "a sexy New York apartment" on Park Avenue done up in monochromatic grays and a smattering of contemporary art. After marrying photographer-adventurer Peter Beard, she commuted between a tent in East Africa and a house on the Montauk cliffs. Her third marriage, to Tony Peck, the son of actor Gregory, brought her back to Los Angeles. After she and Peck divorced, Tiegs decided to redesign "a '50s Polynesian-style A-frame house" for herself and seven-year-old son Zack, which they now share with her fourth husband, yoga master Rod Stryker.

When she first saw the house, Tiegs was immediately won over by the dramatic

